Barber then talks of the unconditioned expressing itself in determined forms or modes. Although Parmenides denied the flow of time completely in ancient times, echoed more recently by the British Idealist J.

Although his strict verificationism may not be in vogue, his analysis of prop
As Schelling explores the logic of this idea, it becomes clear that the unconditioned cannot be any kind of distant supernatural entity, but is the immanent ground of all that is. What accounts for this vibrancy?

Philosophy of religion is not so much religious thinking as it is thinking about Basingstoke and London. It certainly cannot give us cognitive access to the unconditioned, since the unconditioned is not a possible object of experience.
